Similar to what is being done with Facebook, Skype has launched its photo-sharing feature wherein the users can share photos directly from their PC or mobile device with their contacts. Users can now send photos up to 300 MB over Skype. The photo sharing feature is an attempt by Skype to attract more users especially those who are fond of messaging via smartphones or tablets. This initiative comes just a few weeks after Google launched its new instant messaging service Hangouts, which allows free video calling with up to 10 participants. Skype recently launches Skype for TV that will allow you to use your PC to video call or chat with other people on your TV, over WiFi. Skype for TV will be available through Samsung Smart TVs, Panasonic VIERA Connect TVs, Sony BRAVIA Internet Video Link connected Blu-Ray players, Xbox 360 and Xbox One sometime in spring 2014. The devices will be shipped with Skype for TV or can be updated with the latest version of the app from Samsung Apps Store and PlayStation Store. With a Skype for TV, you can do a variety of things, such as: Create a group video call at the same time with your family and friends who are spread across the world Listen to music from your mobile device or laptop wirelessly from the comfort of your couch using DLNA technology. Play videos from SkyDrive directly on TV allowing you to enjoy all your media content in full screen. You'll be able to use Skype remote so that you can control the video calls and chats while you relax on the remote couch.

Skype has so far added support for 21 languages and Indian English is one of them.
