Support for creating and manipulating XForms, a specification for web-page style presentation that allows users to group data and commands into blocks that can be aligned and nested in any way and then imported into MathML, a common method for creating documents in XML. Access to Mathematical Algorithms developed by Wolfram Research. The New Features Mathematica 9 adds major new capabilities and continues to expand on the existing capabilities. These include a new type of search, Searching in Annotation, a new type of pattern, Matching Regex, improved support for graphing, Graph Plotting, a fully integrated equation editor, Word problems, a scriptable and extensible memory structure, Memory, and more. The following sections describe the new features and improvements of Mathematica 9 in greater detail. Type searching The classic approach to searching in Mathematica 9 uses a "find" function in the search bar, typing the keyword you are searching for. Mathematica 9 expands on this approach with a new type of search, searching in annotation. If you mark a cell with a red annotation indicating it's a named location in the document, then any words that match those keywords become the first suggestions for a search. The example in the following figure shows the results of searching for "pattern matching" in a file that contains lines of text. The red annotations in the figure mark the two words "matches" and "matching". The resulting suggestions are "matches", "matching", and "matching query". Searching in annotations is enabled by a new Preferences option, Annotation Findings, which is on by default. The next example shows the result of searching for in the file that has a red annotation. As in the previous example, the typing of in the search bar returns the suggested matches as the first suggestions. The following example shows the result of searching for "text matching" in the file that contains a red annotation. Searching in annotations is currently disabled for files that have a red mathematical notation, but it will be enabled for those files in a future release.
